The screenshot displays a Jira ticket interface with a central comment area. At the top, a code snippet is shown, listing various article IDs and their associated metadata. Below this, a series of replies are visible, including a customer's report, a developer's planned fix, and a link to a GitHub pull request. A diagram of a network or system architecture is also included in the replies. The interface features a dark theme and includes navigation arrows on the left and right sides of the comment area.

@jducro the customer has said that the images were added by copying and pasting from a word document but that is the same process for all other articles

I planned to add a migration to fix existing content, but the fix relies on calling dpv5, which can't be done within a migration. Customer will have to press save again on the incriminated pages to fix them.
